“ he wants me to stay in the marriage so he can be with his child. I think separation and divorce might be the best option for us, but having just moved to NC, I have no where to stay here. We moved here from Ohio in June and I quit my job in April when we had her and knew we would be moving to NC. We don't have the means right now to pay for another home for me, so I contemplated going to stay in Atlanta, GA with my mother. He has threatened to turn me in for kidnapping if I go stay in Atlanta while we are working things out. I am just wondering if there is anyway I would be able to go live in Atlanta while we are separated. If we end up getting divorced, will I always have to live in the state where he resides or can I move to Atlanta to live with family members? He is doing a medical residency here and in 3 years will most likely move to another state. It will make it difficult for me to hold down a steady job if I have to move every time he moves to continue his training. He is working close to 80 hours a week at the moment so my child barely sees him as it is. I just don't know what to do and feel kind of trapped by the situation I find myself in. I am hoping someone can give me some advice. Thanks <http://pryysm.com> [url=<http://yzzutordlad.com>] [link=<http://hrugvs.com>]

“ My brother lives in North Carolina and recently learned that his wife of about 2 1/2 half years has been having an affair and just moved into her own place with the man she is having the affair with. My brother still lives in the home they purchased together. She has not given any reason as to why she left. My brother has witnesses and emails that she was having the affair but she will not give him any reason other than she isn't happy. She was taking their son and meeting up with the guy and spending weekends at the beach. He went to counseling to get through this all and continues to do so to keep his emotions good so that he makes the right decisions on his sons behalf. They have a one year old son. He is a family man by nature and wants to be able to have his son half of the time. She had her attorney write up an agreement of which the terms were laid out. He does not agree to the terms. He sat down with her to ask to change a few things. He wants an additional day every other week. Currently he would only get his son legally about 48 days a year. He also does not want to have permission to take the child to Washington or Oregon because she will always say no. All of his family lives between these two states. He has her recorded There is no way in hell you will take my child out of this state period . She wants to be able to take him to SC but he can't take the child out of state without permission. This is a woman that at 26 years old, my brother took her to Hawaii for their anniversary and she cried for her mom. She insisted on getting married and on having a son. He truly is a good person and would never keep the child from her in any way. He just wants to be involved as much as possible as his dad. His record in life is amazing. Anyone would testify that he is an awesome father. He served in the military for five years. He has a job. He stayed in the home and is now making the mortgage. Without any agreement he is paying half the daycare, medical and of course has their son close to half of the time. Does he have a chance in getting truly half custody? He wants to spend the money to fight for more time and rights with his son but he also wants to not waste it when it could have been used to support his sons needs. Thank you. Jamey

“.Harper has handled it well, but the only one who is acaltuly likely to gain respect is Rob Ford. His heartfelt words, and pointing out he learned from sitting with Layton on council, how to avoid blowing his top \\“despite our differences\\” resonated far more than the whining we are hearing everywhere else. Ford won the election because the expected meltdown in the campaign never happened, and I believe he thanks Jack Layton for teaching him how to keep his cool (relatively speaking!).

“ To the Atchison Family..... It\\'s always unfortunate to have a love one pass away; however, God\\'s plans are many times different from our own. I pray for your family at this time. I wish I had the opportunity to know Uncle Leon better. I am happy that I was able to see him a month ago.

“ Sincere condolences to Leon\\'s family. I served as his mentor at Bizzell Realtors circa 1978. He became an excellent realtor; and, subsequently, a tax preparer. He warm smile and welcoming personality will be missed.
