“ child does not even have a bed. She sleeps on the floor in a moldy home that has no heat in her room. It is infested with black mold and has a hole in the shower wall she goes into another room. I want to know if there is something I can do to help this child. She is an emotional mess and even though I have called SS and she has talked with SS I was made to take her home. Her mother and father have moved her so many times that she is having to take 9th grade again for the 3rd time. Is there a way I can go before a judge with in my county with her to let her tell a judge of her situation to get her help. I have been a family friend for many years and the said child has been left at my house months on end with a phone call here or there saying they knew I would take care of her. This was after she was dropped off for just the weekend with nothing but the clothes on her back. I went and bought her personal effects and clothes and even went so far as to buy her a bed so she would not have to share or sleep on the couch but have her own personal space. There has to be something that can be done in North Carolina to help her. She needs a stable and emotionally sound environment. Can you help me?? <http://bsqltku.com> [url=<http://dpuamjgfc.com>]dp uamjgfc[url] [link=<http://irnbfu.com>]irnbfu[/link]

“ Chapter 13 was not a goal of the Debt Slavery Act of 2005. The only goal was reducing filings, by raising the transaction cost for filing. The Chapter 13 eligibility rules were a ruse, to force debtors to provide a large amount of information to the court. The Debt Slavery Act forced the debtor's lawyer to vet the debtor's statements. This raised the cost of legal services considerably, and thus the transaction costs of filing. Of course, this increase in transaction costs was most onerous for the lower-income filers, who were eligible for Chapter 7. Cute, huh?

“ Wow, I'm soooooo terribly sorry to hear of your loss That's so devastating around the holidays, but has to be so much harder because you have to put on a brave face for the kids. In that unimaginable sadness, I hope you were able to pull comfort from what sounds like a beautiful, tight-knit, and supportive family. I hope these holidays are better for you. Sending lots of *LOVE* your way. *HUGS*
